Montana Missing Opportunities to Give Young Adult Parents and Their Kids a Boost

New Casey Foundation report illuminates needs and barriers facing Montana's young parents and their children

MISSOULA, Mont. — With limited access to opportunities to advance their education and find family-sustaining jobs, Montana's 12,000 young adult parents face hurdles to support their children and fulfill their own potential, according to Opening Doors for Young Parents, the latest KIDS COUNT® policy report from the Annie E. Casey Foundation.

The Casey Foundation's KIDS COUNT grantee in Montana, Montana KIDS COUNT, joined the call for action so these young parents can contribute to the state's communities and economy.

The fifty-state report reveals that, at 13 percent, Montana is just over the national average (10 percent) of youth ages 18 to 24 who are also young parents.

The report highlights the following statewide trends and areas of concern:

- 13,000 children in Montana have young parents ages 18 to 24.
- 63 percent of children of young parents in Montana live in low-income families.
- Only 7 percent of young parents ages 18 to 24 have completed an associate degree or higher.
- 21 percent of Montana's young parents are people of color, facing challenges exacerbated by discrimination and systemic inequities, with their children standing to suffer the most.

The report spotlights a national population of more than 6 million, including 2.9 million young adult parents, ages 18 to 24, and 3.4 million children nationwide living with young parents. Opening Doors for Young Parents illuminates the most common obstacles young adult parents face, including incomplete education, lack of family-sustaining employment opportunities, lack of access to quality child care, inadequate and unstable housing and financial insecurity.

These barriers threaten not only these young adults, but also their young children, setting off a chain of diminished opportunities for two of our nation's future generations. But the report includes recommendations for addressing the obstacles that young parents face, most of which can be driven by policy solutions at the state level.

The Casey Foundation stresses the importance of a two-generation approach to equip young parents for success. “If we don’t support young people when they become parents, we are cheating two generations out of having a positive future,” warned Casey Foundation President and CEO Patrick McCarthy. “We can help young adult parents develop the skills they need to raise their children, contribute to their communities, and drive our national economy forward.”

Thale Dillon, Montana KIDS COUNT Director, highlights the importance of programs that have a two-generation approach, particularly in Montana where there is a shortage of skilled workers. “This is a period of peak opportunity for young parents where guidance and support can set them on the right path to get the skills and education for a self-sustaining career.” Dillon notes that their children also benefit: “The years zero to five are a key window in child development. A strong, stable foundation can set them up for success for kindergarten through high school and beyond.”

Montana KIDS COUNT further stresses the importance of helping the state’s young parents access educational and employment opportunities. In an increasingly competitive workforce landscape, education can make a significant difference in earning power for families. However, as the data demonstrate, young adult parents here in Montana, like young parents nationwide, do not have the post-secondary education or specialized skills to obtain family-sustaining jobs.
